

A DRUNKEN MIDSOMMAR

A DAILY DRUNK ANTHOLOGY EDITED BY KRISTIN CARTW

Table of Contents

Cover Art by Jameson Hampton

Art

May Queen by MAGGIE HOFFMAN

Editorial Note

Death Is A Bear For All Of Us by KRISTIN GARTH, editor of A Drunk Midsommar

Poetry

The Queen Must Ride Alone by TAYLOR BRUNSON

Montage of Exes by MICHAEL CHANG

Bare Home by ASHLEY BULLEN-CUTTING

Unheld by SAM DISTEFANO

Exhaustion, The Ceremony by KAILEY TEDESCO

The Beckons by AMY ALEXANDER

Last Summer in Hårga by RACHAEL CROSBIE

Catchstitch by KOLLEEN CARNEY HOEPFNER

That's ... Not How Bipolar Disorder Works by SHANNON FROST GREENSTEIN

self portrait wearing a dress made out of flowers by WANDA DEGLANE

As the yellow house came down by NICK OLSON

majdrottning by SHYLA JONES

It's Always The May Queen's Choice to Make by JACK BEDELL

How To Deprogram Yourself After Leaving A Cult by H.E. CASSON

This Is My Home by DECEMBER LACE

Hive by DONATELLA DU PLESSIS

Lunar Dust by LOUISE MATHER

(un)blooming by SAMANTHA FAIN

Atop the Cliff by MAGI SUMPTER

Art

Cartoon by JOHN “HOSS” TAYLOR

Flash Fiction

The Disco Tech by MONIQUE QUINTANA

Spinning Under Flowers by PALACES P.

Burning Men by BRIAR RIPLEY PAGE

God's Hand by TAHLIA MCKINNON

Catharsis by SHAWN S. WHITE

Satisfied Customers by TIM GAYDOS

Essay

Picking The Yellow Wallflower Backwards by NICKS WALKER

Monstermanity by JOSH SIPPPIE

May Queen by Maggie Hoffman

editorial note

Death Is A Bear For All of Us

by Kristin Garth, editor of A Drunken Midsommar

Like all great films, Midsommar teaches you something new each time you watch it. On my second watch of the film, I noticed a poster Dani sleeps beneath in her apartment after the death of her family but before she goes to Sweden.

Like the murals of the Hårga, which we see when the visitors enter the housing for younger people, this picture is perfectly prescient of the plot to come. A little blonde girl with a crown (much like Dani) kisses a bear on the nose (much like Christian in his final form). Of course this meant nothing to me the first time I watched the film because I knew nothing about Dani or Christian's future. On the second viewing, I was like what? This was there all along? And I googled.

It turns out the artist is Swedish; his name is John Bauer. Bauer was an illustrator of fairytales. Besides Poor Little Bear, Bauer famously painted a girl crowned with fern and candles. It's called Lucia. Its influence on Midsommar is evident.

Like many of the characters in Midsommar, John Bauer had an early appointment with death. At the young age of 36, he was traveling with his toddler son and wife and made a fateful decision. It is as fateful as the decision Christian, Josh and Mark make in going to Sweden. Hearing of a terrible train wreck, Bauer makes a last minute change in his accommodations to avoid such a fate. His family travels by boat instead — a boat that sinks killing his family.

I found so much parallel meaning in not only the art of Bauer but his life and death as well. Bauer, like all of us, feared death and did his best to avoid it. He failed, as we all will fail ultimately. We will look death in the eye like the bear we always knew was waiting for us in the guise of disease, a murderer, mental illness, whatever its form.

I wrote Poor Little Bear after the painting of its name by Bauer and its influence on Midsommar. We may never go to Sweden or experience the film's brutal rituals regarding death. But we have our own rituals and superstitions and dance with death that convey the fatalism and despair this experience imbues in all of us. We all bow before the poor little bear, that is death, in our own ways, before it ultimately devours us, too.

Poor Little Bear

after Midsommar and Poor Little Bear a print above Dani's bed by the Swedish painter John Bauer

Before familicide, Midsommar, death kept close at hand as Ativan, you repose, lips primrose, exhaling baby's breath below bear, princess a Swedish artist drew.
The beast of death his own eyes peered young into, at 36, he picks a boat trip, abstains from the dangers of the train. Lungs of lake water slay him, his wife and son, flipped by excessive weight of freight, 1918. dDid you know this when you looked at them?
The kiss of death proffered by a tiny queen upon the muzzle of a death machine seems as much nightmare as a fairytale — as is a life in which none of us prevails.

The Queen Must Ride Alone by Taylor Brunson

To flower mountainous
in a pulsing world,
I may never stop dancing again,
throat blooming a wail.

In a pulsing world,
grief: a swallowing
throat, a blooming wail, brains blossoming on impact.

Grief, a swallowing
world growing through me.
Brains, blossoms, impact, flickering gulp of pyres,

a world growing through me again and again and again.
Flickering, gulping pyres for everything I've loved—

again, again, again
you exhaust me,
a thing I've loved
just to be held.

You, exhaust, me.
Another thing to bear
just to feel held,
you have become

another thing to bear
in fire and smoke.
You have become
all my wild laughter.

In fire and smoke,
I flower mountainous.
O, my wild laughter,
I may never stop dancing again.

MONTAGE WITH EXES by MICHAEL CHANG ur a triple threat like awkwardfina ur lies my sustenance

ur perfume my poison

tell me how u crave love ur cult of no-personality husks of boys, formerly young kings, in silent worship they kneel, backs turned, hands empty u mistake them for stone angels in a garden or ghost maps on funny paper they fall, catching themselves, glint of white roses swaying the room rendered a void, there will be no shot of recognition

i could not save u from urself but do not despair

let's try this again

bare home by Ashley Bullen-Cutting

no entry
go away
hose not hoes remember before

you can't write me something like that and just disappear

meanwhile
not asleep
mum and dad
not arguing turn to winter

family fumigation
a flower at a time

unheld by Sam Distefano

she took them so she would never be alone again, leaving you with only his words, a quilt of pity and cruelty unraveling when you become too much for him to bear, he tears you from agony and thrusts you into alien light, leaving you grasping desperately for the ribbon, the stem, whipping, pollinated with the violence of continuing to exist, unheld and sun-soaked, for the first time seeing yourself for what you are

exhaustion, the ceremony BY KAILEY TEDESCO

i could never love you the way i love a triangle— i'm mangled, or else so full of snarl, tears with the energy of a tantrum-child. grief blisters from me in runes of mayflower & crinoline. un-whisked, i can remember where you lived when all the lungs i knew best laid flat & wingless, no limbs garden-raising from the breath of a bear, pre-roar. here i am well-softened & then hardened for good, my cries water the blooms so that i'm consumed in the extinguishing of your flames.
where were you when i had a gut-feeling, when i had a big birthday, when there was no one else? we mourn collectively in our newly grown gowns, un-slumbered & humming, watching ourselves get sick & sweating with the dance & the crowns & severed bleeding hearts we thought we really wanted.

The Beckons by Amy Alexander

Fine linen for the fire Throat burning from a choir of No Slouching in sodden snow
I am easy to know. Open.
My face a button of Astrid.
Purple bruise hue, blasted by wind
And grief. You glean thin-skinned lost girls
For the wreath, thorns and curls May Queens, ribbons to twirl. Ask:” Are You held by him?” My scar Beckons. “Days are longer now, see?
Come find a home with me.”

LAST SUMMER IN HÅRGA by Rachael Crosbie

1. SMOKING HENBANE

When I smoked them, the yellowyoke petals spoke of the dead. They bloated from folk skies and white suns. Wheeled with ghosts, I choked on the roads ahead, silked and woolen and fevered, weeping in my throat.

2. LOOKING IN THE MIRROR

He soaked me with light, the glow swollen and sallow and bright, in front of a two-way mirror. The Other basked in shadows, bloated whispers. A smile broke—

3. BUTCHERED ANIMAL

He basted my lips with so much cherry gloss, dripping from a sloshed sun, to kiss me for the last time. Summer soured my skin, the warmth sitting heavy like spoiled custard. He sunk his bright teeth in me, to swallow brassblood and crave me more as butchered animal than girl.

Catchstitch by Kolleen Carney Hoepfner

Every flower you crushed in your fists made its way into my mouth eventually. Your kerosene kept me slick and dangerous. Have you ever been held by a lilac's base note? It smells like rot, tastes like rot.
Have you ever breathed deeper than a poppy field? Touched a never ending sun? I promise you, eventually you stop picking at the blisters and just let the blackened tissue crackle on your teeth and tongue.

My love. My bright and morning star.
Your fumes became my acrid breath and I am still choking on your ghost after all this time.
I am still screaming into the breasts of my sisters your name, like an incantation. Sisterhood can't save me, I've learned. It can only sync with my tide, stain my bedclothes. Their fingers trace my spine every night.

When you open your eyes don't be frightened.
I am only an idea you once had now. I am only a distant dream, your unwilling maypole tethered by your calloused hands.
Think about how painful it is for me to be so revered.
Think about how delicious it could be, to finally be the bear.

Hive by Donatella du Plessis

We are held too hard in our man-made hive Bees that do not swarm Awakened each day by the light
Of an artificial sun

Whether dreaming, or dream-reading
We are solitary never Who would not wish to be a Queen
If it meant riding alone?

That's ...Not How Bipolar Disorder Works by Shannon Frost Greenstein

I have known the depths of darkness anguish disguised as apathy, brain devouring itself like an ouroboros sinking through the miasma and into the melancholy realm where everything is futile; where there is no redemption.

But I just watched Midsommar, and that's not how Bipolar Disorder works.

I have stayed awake for days high on my own neurotransmitters, anxiety sparking from my fingertips psyche vibrating while my hands refuse to settle and absolute crap with impulse control.

But I just watched Midsommar, and that's not how Bipolar Disorder works.

I have frightened those I love made threats I did not intend, cries for help manifesting as tempest mental illness speaking with my voice and desperate for someone to provide a respite.

But I just watched Midsommar, and that's not how Bipolar Disorder works.

I have had bad ideas before schemes birthed in a flash of insight, better left undiscovered I have failed to consider natural consequences and regretted my reckless decisions.

But I just watched Midsommar, and that's not how Bipolar Disorder works.

I have yet to be homicidal a danger to others, prone to breakdowns of the schizoid nature I am not the insanity typically attributed to my gender or to my disease.

But I just watched Midsommar, and that's not how Bipolar Disorder works.

I have learned to cope with this Achilles' Heel, the maelstrom of mania and depression to successfully navigate life in this world and to be capable of joy.

Because that's how Bipolar Disorder works.

self portrait wearing a dress made out of flowers by Wanda Deglane after Midsommar (2019), dir. Ari Aster

I want you to tell me the world is green and beautiful / and everyone is dancing / tell me I can scream for as long as I want / and I'll someday be able to make myself stop / I want to be crumpled against somebody's chest / but these days being held / feels more like being beartrapped / bearskinned / these flowers growing heavy on my shoulders / this daylight seeping from my mouth / tell me if I light my heartbreaks on fire / I might see a better me in the ashes / glowing honey-skinned and smiling / tell me we're tumbling end over end over this cliff / and we'll just spread our lungs like wings and fly.

As the yellow house came down by Nick Olson

We'd gone in having watched the first trailer, had seen Hereditary, but that was it.
Popcorn in Winston's little arthouse, a/perture screening, scooting into the end of an aisle.

It was the slow unfolding for me, then Dani's cry, guttural, cue title, cue music,
cue Ari Aster fucking both of us up.

I think we saw both of our exes in Christian,
a gaslight sprinkle here, insult dash there, and the audacity of leaving something like that.

Cutting away our codependencies and trauma bonding,
watching the Hårga watch, and the soundless drop of bodies onto stone.

Coming out a little bit, think I dissociated with Dani, and you said holy shit or holy fuck, can't remember quite which now.

And the way that people ask, But how can you be tricked into something like that? How can you let someone hurt you?

And hoping they never find out for themselves.

Catharsis isn't something common in horror films, isn't a requirement or often even a consideration. But Dani had it, and I think we did too.

So we spun with her,
and watched flowers dilate, studied color differences in drinks, story visualized in paintings, tapestries.

As the yellow house came down and the flames went up, transition into Dani's smile,
we let out all we'd been carrying.

majdrottning by Shyla Jones

we are only as holy as the runes say we are the rock bleeds under fog and we kiss the soft eyed girl until she skins herself and feeds us her skeleton like pig's feet

ättestupa ättestupa

ättestupa ättestupa

spring has sprung so let us hammer skulls into fertilizer throw rotting bodies into floral senicide and wear the shells of artless men to seduce the bear we sing our song and together it consumes like fire
until she sweats out the noose tied around her neck and twirls around it in the sun instead we are always splitting apples with our mouths feeling
tulips crunching down our swollen throats majdrottning we are kissing your fruit by the maypole the burst of blommor
on your neck like sun flare flowering for every decade
hereafter

It's Always the May Queen's Choice to Make by Jack B. Bedell

Empathy's easy to come by when we see a bear locked inside a cage so small it can barely spin around.
Our hearts want to unbind its chains, set it free to run into open field. Maybe just not the field we're standing in.
And as much as we know how trapped this bear is,
how locked into its own skin, how many of us would choose to strip our own bodies bare, be lifted off our chair and placed into the bear's warm belly, to feel its blood bond to our naked selves until we are truly one creature set free by flames to float as ash on air?

Lunar Dust by Louise Mather

If the blossom does not flare -

standing between you and the precipice,

stooping dust of lunar shadows, coiled

summer soaked
to flesh,

haunted by the trail of elixirs

the moulding of breath, vermillion in the river.

Is this not the dream you had as a child -

from the first thorn, to know

how everything will end-with feathered skulls, runes clasped to bark.

How to Deprogram Yourself After Leaving a Cult by H.E. Casson

First:

break the very smallest of the cult-created rules break it often break it softly

(perhaps a word, forbidden) (perhaps a lie, unhidden)

until you have defanged it till it's failing to elicit a chest flutter
a breath catch a dizzy spell

until the hell they promised comes in waves
and not deluges
flow and ebbing
your refuge is just another line un-ruled you've learned to cross

say it loud: you're not the boss of me

Next:

you practice being free

spend a day where you do nothing I mean nothing full-on nothing

put the leisure back in pleasure sleep till dinner and don't measure
out your portions

drink an ocean
eat a forest
dance arrhythmic to the chorus or just stop
I mean stop full-on stop
Then:
go but when you want to go to places where they want you to discover what you want to do instead of what they want you to and leave before they say you can make a plan

and then erase it build a shrine
and then deface it

spackle over all your cracks with sticky tac

And then:
don't ever go back

This is My Home by December Lace

I reign in fields of flowers, a crown of blooms upon my head.

I am no longer anchored inside closets of grief, chained to nightmares and drowning in sorrow, my severed roots twisting aimlessly in spurts of agony and rage beneath my skin.

I reign in fields of flowers, a crown of blooms upon my head, the howls of grief no longer racking my soul.

This is my catharsis, this is my flowered tomb, how I will spend the rest of my days-not collapsed inside a sheltered body of assigned flesh, but a devoted member to a collective whole, a communal cry, my smile plucked deep from the underworld and given as One, reigning in fields of flowers, the howls of grief no longer racking my soul, a crown of blooms upon my head.

(un)blooming by Samantha Fain

after Lucille Clifton

won't you celebrate with me what I have shaped into a kind of life?

again I have remade myself into what I need most:

pleasure, a pile of happy flowers. the burning warms me—we hold each other. I do not need convinced of my peace.

I gesture towards light, offer my heat and cement my body again as sacred.

I forget all my befores and live in newness.

what did I see to be except a softer violence, a mouth that drinks the juice of ripe fruit, tears skin open just for the burst? similar to sunrise. similar to how everyday something has tried to kill me but this time I killed myself first.

Atop the cliff by Magi Sumpter

i

Atop the cliff, wander through green meadows
above. The sky
calls below me,
a wintry mix of
cloud and carmine, louder than your own mortality.

ii

Atop the cliff,
find ourselves
among the gods, smearing life in
with solid earth,
so that we might be remembered
as gods ourselves.
Our children look up from the sun and smile.

i

Atop the cliff,
soar downwards
to the heavens below, the frozen smile all you need to survive the trial. I will follow you soon, praying
this aerial serenity
is the first thing
I remember.

Cartoon by JOHN "HOSS" TAYLOR

Flash fiction

the disco tech by Monique Quintana

There once was a doll who couldn't hide the way she watched her own legs in the grass. Little did she know this was the prelude to another dimension where she and her best boy doll would be wedded. On her favorite day of the year, not her birthday but not her death day, her bones began to make her a dress of balloons and cellophane. A song began to make its way out of her mouth as a garden path open up for her, lined with mannequin heads and synthetic hair flying in the sky like ribbons. That morning was a bear, a realization that the boy she planned to love just wasn't right for her. The clouds sketched her a pistil-shaped drinking glass to celebrate how the rag lovers would hate each other now and forever after. She began to dance to the beat of perpetual daybreak. The strawberry shot honey rained down her hands to make truce gloves, but she rejected them. Little rag doll sisters emerged and began to bake her rib cage brightly as a wooden tavern light. Its inflammation made the strobe lights there, and they all danced inside them. Dress flowers dress flowers are a cheap waste of time, they said. Our doll heroine began to slide on the grass, slick and slower than the rollerball lip gloss on her face in her passport photo. She thought it would be the best party ever, but it wasn't, still she danced on anyway.

Spinning Under Flowers by Palaces P.

You are shivering, rhythmic on one side of the room, and on the other I'm sitting in my coat. You come see me when I become suicidal, and you tell me that you wrote a short story. It is the best news that I have ever heard. A girl wants to tell me that I am sexy, and then we are yelled at for peeing too much before we got here because oh damn this stuff made my pussy wet, and it was so wet that I started to have a river in my head, too. And the stuff was purple, sort of like my dress, because it got mixed up in your bag with your dye from the Frosh week. How funny is that? Later, I cannot speak. I can only ask if someone turned on the lamp in the mid-night. You say that you didn't— but, oh, the purest flame inside my closed lids

Burning Men by Briar Ripley Page

Day of the flower ritual, day of the sacrifice, longest and brightest, day of days. You are among the chosen, and you are honored to stand on the stage with the others.

You understand that you are being given a gift— that you are being given as a gift— that the next few hours will be beautiful, suffused with joy and power. The captives, struggling weakly at their bonds through a haze of narcotic drugs, don't understand anything. Their chairs clatter as they rock back and forth, muscles and fat bulging between coarse, tight ropes. They roll their eyes around like frightened horses. It won't matter to the gods of the poppy and the field. Their bones will be accepted into the earth just as yours will be. Their flesh will be taken up by the sun and the air, ensuring another year of lush crops and fair weather.

Your sister puts a crown of reeds and bluebells on your head; she gives you a reed doll to hold.

Because you are a child of the faith, you will not feel any pain. All the agony of death will pour out from your skin and into the doll's woven limbs. You thank your sister with a smile, although you are no longer

allowed to speak.

A toast, a song, a dance. The high priestess blesses you and your brothers in sacrifice green. She doesn't bother blessing the captives, who would not accept her blessing anyway. Two of them seem to have passed out. The third is moaning and shaking his head. Sun turns his curly hair and beard stubble from dirt to copper. If he were not drugged, and faithless, and afraid, he would be by far the most handsome among you.

The high priestess stands before the crowd. She says a few words. She says exactly as many words as she needs to say. Then the mayor mounts the stage and drones for a while about community and pride and strength and the cycles of the seasons. The love inherent in the act of giving one's life for the continuation of a greater whole. The mayor enjoys his own voice; he's probably the only one who does. You fidget with your reed doll as he talks and talks. When you look at the copper-haired man again, he's succumbed to unconsciousness. Drool leaks out of his mouth and trickles down the side of his tan, muscular neck.

Your mouth is dry, you realize. You wish you could have some water. You wish you had paid closer attention to the taste, the coolness, when you were given your last draught earlier.

The mayor is finished. Finally. The climax of the flower ritual is at hand.

All the young, unmarried women check that the bundles of sticks, hay, reeds, sweetgrass, and dried blossoms around the stage are packed tight. They make adjustments as needed. Everybody else retreats to a safe, respectful distance. Your sister makes eye contact with you once, lifting a bale to a higher position on the pyre. Her eyes gleam with wetness. She nods and smiles. Her fingers shake between the twigs.

When they've finished, the Poppy Maiden in her red dress makes a signal. The other women, all in white, step back, forming a wide circle around the stage and the stacked kindling.

The Poppy Maiden sprinkles accelerant over you and your companions, over the boards of the stage, over everything. She does this with unhurried precision, like she's solving a math problem.

She strikes the long match. Drops it. Retreats.

Ignition.

You watch the flames swirl up in great, spitting orange ribbons. The women have begun to sing a threshing song. You look into the summer sky, bluer than any water. Your mouth is still dry. Your feet and legs are starting to get uncomfortably hot. Your eyes tear up, and smoke threads through your lungs.

The copper-haired man catches fire. You smell him burning, a cooked animal with crackling skin. His hair is lost in black and red and gold. A shimmer of incredible heat. As far as you can tell, he never wakes up.

When the edges of your trouser legs start to crisp and ripple with flame, you're not afraid. You clutch your reed doll and wait for the glory. Soon you'll be one with the sun and the air.

A shock of pain takes you by surprise. You are too surprised even to scream. The pain, itself a kind of long, red, searing scream, takes your voice away. You're watching your own flesh crackle and char now.

This is not supposed to happen. You're supposed to be protected.

But it turns out the fire doesn't care about spells or rituals or fear or faith. The reed doll combusts all at once between your blistering palms. You bite through your tongue. You can't breathe.

The village and its people are lost to your vision in the fire and the smoke, though you can still hear singing. You cannot see your sister. You cannot pick her voice out of the multitude.

You cannot see her, but you want to tell her about your mistake, about the truth of the world, grim and almost funny. You want to tell her that none of it matters. That drugged and bound or crowned and willing, no matter our beliefs, we all go the same. And it hurts more than anything else.

God's Hand by Tahlia McKinnon

i wondered, often, why we only ever made love outside. then, one night, as we lay rooted to the forest floor, our wiry limbs entwined, he asked me how it felt to have god's hand upon me. to have angels bear witness to my beauty. and i understood, then. why his benevolent touch sometimes felt like thorns through my flesh. why the pain was always so exquisite.

lately, he has been telling me that nature has forgotten me. plants the words like a half-grown kiss upon my cheek; lips taut like apple skins. i see black roses blooming from between his teeth. and the earth feels suddenly unwholesome underneath me.

i find myself thinking back to that very first time. on the beach, when we stood with hot sand underfoot, tongues spilling like froths of seafoam. my half-formed hands were slick with sunscreen and sweat. sprawled, we melted into the soupy sediment, naked bodies pallid and ablaze.

after, we'd sat staring out to sea. i had never seen it before, not in real life. nature reveals the truth of our own, he had breathed, voice strangled by half-slumber. his words crashed against the dark whisper of the waves, part seductive and harrowing to me. i couldn't place why.

we had stirred from our sleep, eyes gritty like pitted olives. the sea curling frozen fingers around our toes. wind kicking up sand like an impatient child. and i was an impatient child then, too. i wanted him, again – though the sun had scored our backs and singed our flesh. the ocean's stigmata.

between hot heady kisses, he had asked me of my dreams. and i found myself telling him. split open like an oyster; equal parts shiny and dark. see, i had the same dreams every night.

standing at the edge of the earth, unclothed and alone. always, i try to pray, but find i have run out of words. it is such a dark and desolate place; i feel it change me. the waves below begin to crack like knuckles. the smell of sea brine hangs so thickly in the air, that my stomach starts to churn in the same rhythmic patterns as the water. the wind begins to roar; grows wilder. the ground rumbles beneath my feet. sky turns blood-shark black. my skin crawls with my soul; puckers and blisters like salt of the earth. and suddenly, i know that i am about to die in the most violent of ways. but it's as if my life finally makes sense to me – now that it's ending.

i had worried that i'd scared him. but he had told me, then, of how he pitied me. exposed to so much, so young. when i was your age, life's grievances were like catching fish in bare hands. they would sooner slip from your grip. now, your lot must learn to gut them first.

and i had smirked then. because i knew how we survived it. how humans were such dirty, filthy creatures after all. i asked him what he thought it meant. the recurring night terror. if i was cursed; damned; condemned. i walk a path of faith, not fear - he had insisted. but i had never known the difference.

even in the years that followed, after we had scorched ourselves in midsummer meadows, fingered desires in nondescript fields, lay each other down in lakes, leaves, under canopies of trees – i never knew what secrets lay scattered in the soil, coiled up like little slugs. and come dusk, before i ever had a chance to ask him, in a flash of suburban dust – he'd disappear.

and now, he only tries to harvest my darkness. fell me down and dig out my sadness. still, he can't see how like a tree i truly am; gnarly ugly roots the realest part of me – never the flowers.

Catharsis by Shawn S. White

It's over, Lyn.

It's over, Lyn.

It's over.

Underneath the heat of the waning streetlamp, he was breaking up with me. We left my apartment eight hours ago, smiling. At least, I was smiling. Now, I stood in the heat of dawn wondering why I didn't wear my tennis shoes instead of my pumps and why my boyfriend was breaking up with me. The bitterness of the salt in my eyes obscured my sight, and he stood in front of me like a watercolor painting, mixes of dark hues.

"What?" Was all I could muster.

He turned in circles, from what I could tell, stammering. The sun bled behind him, an orange-gold fusing with his flesh colors.

We're done.

I dragged my sleeve across my face, staining my new red top. For a moment, my sight was clear, but he was cast in shadow. What was he thinking? Then, the tears welled, and the world was a messy canvas yet again.

Then, "What did I do?" Did I say that? The voice was my own, but the thought was not.

Nothing. It's just me. I'm not r...

His voice felt far, then I realized his back was turned to me. Each syllable was drowned out by the passing, honking taxis and staggering, mumbling drunkards wandering around us.

"What?"

I'm just not ready! Do I have to repeat it? You know how hard this is for me?

He was looking at me again, I could tell. His voice was clear, but his face was blurred, contorted, as I tasted more salt against my tongue.

"I thought you loved me," I said, struggling to breathe underneath the words, the air pumping in and out, in and out.

I always will. But not like that. You're very special to me.

Then, his hand was on my face, rubbing away the streaks. His fingers were cold against my warm skin, as I bathed in the rising sun. His yellow shirt was suddenly clear to me as he brought his arm back to his side, and I realized how much I'd always hated it. But never until now. Then, he reached down. He picked something up.

Here. I know you love these little flowers that grow on the street.

He ripped a dandelion from the dirt and decorated my head with it. His fingers felt like claws as he mangled my hair, placing the flower in an uncomfortable position where it drooped over my face and pulled on my roots.

You look beautiful.

The tears slowed, and his face was morphing back to normal. His crooked nose stuck out to me, and it was suddenly too long and pointy. His ears were small, too.

Take care of yourself, okay?

Then, he hugged me. My body went still. I felt nothing. His breath reeked after all the wine and sushi we'd consumed. His odor nauseated me, probably from all the dancing. When he let go, I breathed. How long did that hug last? I think he smiled at me, and then began walking away—into the street.

I closed my eyes and waited for him to vanish out of sight, until maybe I woke up and was back in bed, rearing my head from drunken nightmares. I didn't feel the glass sting me until I opened my eyes again and saw him lying on the hood of a taxi. His head had gone through the windshield, and the glass scattered everywhere. He bled into his awful yellow shirt, and his mangled body looked like a human hamburger. His face was clear, glass shards piercing his eye sockets and nostrils. He was looking at me—with what was left of his face, anyway.

Around me, a mother was crying as she held her child who couldn't help but stare on. A man was screaming for help. The taxi driver was limping as he stumbled out of his car, weeping.

The morning was warm, like an embrace. I took a deep breath and stared into the sky, and smiled.

Satisfied Customers by Tim Gaydos

It was a simple phone call that brought him here.

“They need a bear, an adolescent. Preferably one already tamed.”

Animal trafficking was one of the many hats Kristoff wore so he thought nothing of it at the time. It wasn't until he was in route and realized just how far off the beaten path the directions provided were taking him that he began to wonder what he had gotten himself into. When the man who introduced himself as Father Odd offered him a drink, Kristoff could only answer yes. Father Odd was so warm and welcoming when Kristoff had arrived with the bear, turning down the offer would be rude. He had to drink it, even if it did taste too sweet to be spring water. Now, Kristoff found himself sitting in the grass next to his ex wife as the wind began to swirl all the colors of the trees together.

“It was a mistake to come here,” she told him. “One more mistake you can add to your list.”

Slowly Kristoff turned and looked at the woman he had claimed to love, back when she was flush with her family's money. He tried to open his mouth and speak but it was weighed down with loathing. She smiled without warmth as blood trickled down the side of her head from the hole she put there once Kristoff had taken everything and left.

He could hear the shapes of voices. They were discussing him. That was all Kristoff understood. “You are quite the topic it seems,” his ex wife's voice surrounding him. “Neither villager nor visitor. Isn't that something.”

Kristoff's hands were vibrating now. He looked down at them, these hands that had swindled so many. They were talented hands, adept at many forms of mischief. Now they swayed in stillness, growing and blossoming from his skin. They were miraculous, these hands. The ones that so long ago moved chess pieces across the board as his father tried to teach him the game. “You sacrifice the pawns,” the old man had instructed. Kristoff took that lesson to heart but never cared for the game itself, for the patience required. His father would always wear disappointment from across the table, the same face he would wear when Kristoff signed the documents declaring the old man of unsound mind. The same face now peering back at Kristoff from his own hands.

That wasn't right. That didn't make sense. Nothing made sense.

Kristoff looked back up at his ex-wife, pleading. I'm sorry, he said with his eyes. I'm sorry for everything.

Astrid looked back at him with flowers blooming from the sockets. “It doesn't matter,” Kristoff felt her say.

Suddenly Kristoff realized he was walking, being led away from Astrid as the grass seemed to part before his path. There were people on either side of him grasping his shoulders, all smiles and pleasantries. They spoke but the words flowed over him with little friction, leaving only a general imprint. They were pleased, but no longer needed Kristoff. It was a good thing, the wind told him.

Ahead of them stood a figure who held something large in his hands. It looked very heavy, and Kristoff knew it was meant for him. As he knelt down in front of the figure Kristoff heard his father once again. "You sacrifice the pawns." For one last moment, Kristoff understood.

Picking The Yellow Wallflower Backwards by Nicks Walker

Summer is magical, even when you know how it's done. I can understand why we might burn each other alive to ensure the end of winter, or the sunrise. That part of me is a tiny animal lost in the gaze of yellow. Yellow is an outlier, an in-between. It is the colour of smiley faces, anthrax, Pikachu and daffodils. It is a primary colour in pigment, but not in light – so, for man made things, for art, but not for nature. Yet it is the colour of flowers – petal crowned bundles of genitals, feeding our bodies and our ecosystems, pouring up out of the ground in semi-perfect, repetitive, mathematically generated patterns. Yellow is where the geometric and the organic meet. It appears where our animal brains – pattern crunching machines – are most primal, and primed to perceive miracle. The ineffable blessings of the day and of the end of winter, the meta-dawn. Yellow marks the boundary between life and death.

Midsommar is a film about eating life and digesting grief. It is deeply about the horror and ecstasy of yellow.

Firefighters follow a long yellow tube to the annihilated bodies of Dani's family. Tuned up against a muted blue background, these incursions of yellow are as unnatural and natural as death. They are rubber and plastic, inorganic, a warning – poison. But the men, in their black and yellow stripes, are also bees, dispassionately harvesting. There is fertility abundant, if dormant, in the sterile tragedy of winter.

The scale of yellow's incursion on a blue world escalates as midsummer dawns. A yellow pyramid looms over Dani – a discordant meeting of fake and real, natural and constructed, obscenity and the divine. Yellow is in the bowls, the meals, the pubic-hair laced tarts, and most of all, the flowers of the Hårga. The reverence for yellow is absolute in a community that worships the balance of life and death. Young girls pick yellow flowers backwards, killing the small things in celebration of their life. Yellow flowers fill the eyes of a sacrificial corpse, displayed, hung by wings of inverted lungs. Yellow is the obscenity of miracle, the point where horror becomes beauty – something that the Hårga doesn't just understand, but venerates.

Christian is disgusted by a casual gift of the flowers because he sees sacrifice, obligation, in their giving. Nothing is given with no intention of receiving. The yellows of midsummer, the height of day, the prime of adulthood, flowers in bloom, are all situated at the crest of life. Christian is horrified by the yellow flowers as he is horrified by his adult body, the pressure of decision, and the risk of change – his fertility and his impotence. He feels plucked by Dani – killed and trapped in his prime, and obliged to give her life in return for his murder. He isn't strictly right, but he is attuned to his social context, the cultural physics of the Hårga. (At this point, if no other, he is a promising anthropologist.)

The flowers, crushed, create the psychedelic yellow-water which the Hårga use to break down internal boundaries and connect, unclouded, to nature. Ingesting the yellow brings Dani and Christian into a dance of life and death, artificially juxtaposed and entwined. Dani dances, speaks, grieves, eats, is crowned, and kills. Christian is raped, paralysed, stuffed into a bear, and burned alive. The themes of the yellow-trip are organic, but it is fundamentally inorganic – a naturalistic sequence of events engineered by the Hårga around characters, archetypes. It is a fertility ritual, deliberate and man-made. They are in the yellow-zone, a hyperreality where opposing binaries are compressed into a single bursting flower of movement, mathematically precise. They are victims of the lunacy of patterns and shapes - the ever-compelling belief that human action must turn the wheels of the natural world. Psychedelics only intensify the human lens on reality.

There is a Swedish saying - “Gult e fult” - meaning, approximately, yellow is ugly¹. It is not surprising that we find yellow ugly. It is not surprising that it scares us. The miraculous inorganic fertility of yellow does something to the human brain – it says, this cannot just be happening. We did this, somehow – and if we want to survive, we need to do it again. This is a tragic heuristic, and one Midsommar understands deeply.

Midsommar is about the profound liberation of being ecstatically human – of being social, physical and worshipful, of fucking and screaming and grieving, of celebrating the gifts that come with loss, and the losses that come with gifts. It is also about delusions of synchronicity, patterns, and the perceived demands of nature. There is horror in the way we seek balance, in our everyday ritualism, in the rush of grotesque joy we feel when we watch another person grieve or fuck or burn. We are, despite our artificiality, a part of nature. We cannot academically distance ourselves from ourselves. The incursion of yellow, the fertilisation of the egg, the rise of the sun, are magical. Midsommar reminds us of the danger in that magic - especially when we think we know how it's done.

1 Midsommar Production designer Henrik Svensson (<https://www.frameweb.com/article/the-creepiest-character-in-the-midsommar-movie-its-the-spatial-design>)

Monstermanity by Josh Sippie

I used to host “Scary Movie Tuesday” in college. Every Tuesday, another new horror movie, another new monster. We watched everything from Insidious to The Conjuring to Innkeepers and a general through line creased the lot of them—monsters, dead or alive or somewhere in between. Once you met the monster, all that fear you’ve been building up over the course of the movie was put to the test. If the monster was terrifying, your fear was given a face.

If the monster was lacking, your fear fizzled like a deflating balloon and the movie lost its edge.

It got to the point where no monster, no zombie or demon or ghost, stood out from any other. Except Sinister, but that’s a talk for another day. Which means—nothing justified true terror anymore. Every movie, you build up this anticipation to see the manifestation of evil and it ends up looking like a low-budget birthday party clown. I used to do this trick, in the early days of Scary Movie Tuesday, where I’d watch the corner of the screen to avoid seeing the monster head on. But I didn’t even need that anymore.

Then came Midsommar. My mother-in-law invited me to watch it after a particularly long conversation about scary movies. She’d seen it before, I hadn’t. Just us two. I went in with this brazen confidence that I was the scary movie champion, I’d seen it all, I couldn’t be scared.

“I hosted a scary movie night every Tuesday,” I told her for probably the third time, sitting on my $100 fold-out Wal-Mart futon with zebra-print fleece throw.

“This isn’t like those movies,” she said.

“That’s what they say about The Conjuring too.”

As we watched, from about the third minute on, I was sweating, tensed, gritting my teeth. I deflected my discomfort with jokes, pretending like everything was okay. Everything was distinctly not okay. I hated Midsommar. I truly, deeply hated it. I still do. I wanted every moment to be the last. I didn’t want to feel these things I was feeling. I didn’t want to think about the things that were etched into my brain like Sumerian cave paintings.

You want to know why I hate flowers? Midsommar. I used to think bears were my spirit animals. Guess who ruined that? Midsommar.

It all stemmed from my inability to put my finger on the villainous evil. I couldn’t find the painted face of a monster, the horns of a devil, the teeth of a beast. The monster was human. Those old folks who broke their heads open like gourds on the rocks? That was humanity. Burning folks alive? Humanity. Stringing them up like potted plants? Humanity.

There is no zombie crawling out of the grave, no demon infiltrating your soul. You are the problem. We are the problem. And we always have been, now that I think about it. Thankfully, I've never had a scary, white-faced witch crawl through my computer screen and destroy my family from the inside out. I've never had undead guests at a hotel push me down stairs. These things don't happen. And as an amateur ghost hunter, I've looked for these things. They aren't there. But humans murdering other humans in disgusting, often ritualistic ways? That shit happens. And that's what makes this godforsaken movie so fucking scary. There aren't any monsters other than us and what we let ourselves become, and what we do to each other.

I haven't seen Midsommar in two years, but I still reckon with it at least once a week. I still think about more than I'd like to. I've stopped facing down googly-eyed monsters and started facing all the monstrous things I've done over the years. I was a bully. I was a drunk. I was rude, arrogant, selfish, misleading, and at times, just a straight up asshole, a liar, a cheat, a thief. Now, I never convinced anyone to jump off a cliff to kill themselves, but let's invoke the words of the Bible here—For whoever keeps the whole law but fails in one point has become accountable for all of it (James 2:10 ESV).

Thanks, James, for tag-teaming with a Swedish cult to remind me that I'm an awful person who might as well have strung up my enemies and planted some azalea bushes in them. But that's the new reckoning. Not whether your fear will be justified by a scary mug and pointy teeth, but whether you can do better than someone else. And I obviously don't mean accomplish more, or score more points. I mean be better. Kinder, nicer, sweeter, however you want to put it. In a completely noncompetitive way. Not just by not fucking murdering them in a grotesque grandstanding, but in not cutting them off on the sidewalk, or not using a condescending tone. Every little bit helps. And hey, maybe if you show someone else that kindness, they, in turn, won't lock everyone inside the house at the next family Christmas Party and burn the house down.

I never approached horror movies to get introspective and maybe that isn't even the point of Midsommar. It's probably not. All I know is I have no need to re-watch Midsommar anytime soon because I'm still too busy reckoning with my first viewing of it from two years ago. Until I can come to terms with being a better person myself, I'm not ready to be reminded how evil people can really be.

About The Contributors

MAGGIE HOFFMAN is a professional writer and artist from small-town Pennsylvania who is inspired by all things horror.

TAYLOR BRUNSON is a poet living in Chapel Hill, North Carolina. Her work has recently been featured in Non.Plus Lit, perhappened, Horse Egg Literary, and Dwelling Literary. She serves as an assistant poetry editor for Four Way Review and an assistant nonfiction editor for Nashville Review. Taylor can be found on Twitter, @taylor_thefox.

A Lambda Literary fellow, MICHAEL CHANG (they/them) is the author of two previous collections of poetry. Their poems have been nominated for Best New Poets, Best of the Net, & the Pushcart Prize. Their collection CHINATOWN ROMEO is forthcoming from Ursus Americanus Press.

ASHLEY BULLEN-CUTTING is a creative-critical English Literature and Creative Writing PhD student at the University of Sheffield. He has a lot of poetry and prose out in the world (MIROnline, Perhappened, Anti-Heroine Chic) and sometimes these get read. He likes whales, horror, and the forgotten.

SAM DISTEFANO is a Graphic Designer and sometimes writer. He loves movies, pizza, and dogs and that's about it. @numbestskull KAILEY TEDESCO is the author of She Used to be on Milk Carton, Lizzie, Speak, and FOREVERHAUS. She is a senior editor for Luna Luna Magazine. You can find her work in Electric Literature, The Journal, Passages North, Fairy Tale Review, and more. For further information, please visit kaileytesco.com.

RACHAEL CROSBIE (she/they) tweets things about She-Ra and The Princesses of Power, cats, and her fiancé. She has written work forthcoming or published in HOLYFLEA!, Southchild Lit, The Augment Review, and others. Also, they have two chapbooks: Swerve (2021) and MIXTAPES (2021).

AMY ALEXANDER teaches and makes art, writes books, and grows where she is planted (far away from the red Colorado dirt of her childhood) near the Mississippi River. She wears a mask nine hours a day and teaches 500 elementary and middle school students how to be authentic and tell the truth in their art. Follow her @iriemom.

KOLLEEN CARNEY HOEPFNER is the author of two chapbooks, the mother of two children, and the builder of two dollhouses. She is the EIC of Drunk Monkeys and lives in Burbank, CA with her family.

SHANNON FROST GREENSTEIN (she/her) resides in Philadelphia with her children, soulmate, and persnickety cats. She is the author of “Pray for Us Sinners,” a collection of fiction from Alien Buddha Press, and “More.,” a poetry collection by Wild Pressed Books. Shannon is a former Ph.D. candidate in Continental Philosophy and a multi-time Pushcart Prize and Best of the Net nominee. Her work has appeared, or is forthcoming, in McSweeney’s Internet Tendency, Pithead Chapel, Bending Genres, Epoch Press, X-R-A-Y Lit Mag, and elsewhere. Follow Shannon at shannonfrostgreenstein.com or on Twitter at @ShannonFrostGre.

WANDA DEGLANE is a night-blooming desert flower from Arizona. Her poetry has been published or forthcoming in Glass Poetry, Drunk Monkeys, Yes Poetry, Cosmonauts Avenue, and elsewhere. Wanda is the author of Melancholia (Vegetarian Alcoholic Press, 2021) and other chapbooks.

NICK OLSON is the author of Here's Waldo and Editor-in-Chief of (mac)ro(mic). Originally from Chicagoland, he now lives in North Carolina. He’s been published in SmokeLong Quarterly, Hobart, decomp, and other fine places. Find him online at nickolsonbooks.com or on Twitter @nickolsonbooks.

SHYLA JONES is a summer baby. She loves the sun, daydreaming, and, sometimes, writing. Read her work at shylajones.com.

JACK B. BEDELL is Professor of English and Coordinator of Creative Writing at Southeastern Louisiana University where he also edits Louisiana Literature and directs the Louisiana Literature Press. Jack’s work has appeared in Southern Review, Pidgeonholes, The Shore, Okay Donkey, EcoTheo, The Hopper, Terrain, and other journals. His latest collection is Color All Maps New (Mercer University Press, 2021). He served as Louisiana Poet Laureate 2017-2019.

H. E. CASSON (they/them) is a queer writer and voice actor whose words have been shared by Cast of Wonders, Taco Bell Quarterly, and The Avenue. After being indoors for 14 months, they fervently hope their future includes poetry readings at dimly lit cafes and picnics in crowded parks. They can be found online at hecasson.com and as @hecasson on Twitter.

MAGI SUMPTER drafts divorce papers by day and eats them with spinach artichoke dip by night. They are the editor-in-chief of Southchild Lit, and you can find them on Twitter @MagiSumpter.

DONATELLA DU PLESSIS is a micropoet from Durban, South Africa. Her poetry has appeared in “Feminine Collective”, “Idle Ink” and “Dust Poetry Magazine”, and is forthcoming in “The Rainbow Poems”.

BRIAR RIPLEY PAGE is in the process of relocating from Pennsylvania to London. They've had previous fiction published in venues including Prismatica and beestung; they've also self-published several short stories and novellas that may be found via their website (briarripleypage.xyz). Briar has enjoyed folk horror and learning about cults for at least twenty years.

DECEMBER LACE is a Best of the Net nominee, cosplay pinup model and former professional wrestler from Chicago. She has appeared in The Chicago Tribune, Pro Wrestling Illustrated, Twist in Time, Pink Plastic House and Coffin Bell among others. She loves Batman, burlesque, cats and horror movies. Handle her @TheMissDecember HOSS, (KNOWN TO SOME AS JOHN TAYLOR) is an artist from Hebron, Maryland. Mr. Taylor graduated from Salisbury University with a bachelor's degree in art. Hoss's work has been published in various online literary magazines such as: Echoes and Visions, Weirderary, Saturday Morning Comics, Chicago Literati, Chaleur Magazine, and Inlandia: A Literary Journey, The Daily Drunk, Taco Bell Quarterly, Big Whoopie Deal, Wrongdoing Magazine, Fleas on the Dog, Oddball Magazine, The Holy Flea, and 86 Logic. Hoss can be found at home (even before Covid) with his wife Caitlin, their beagle Belle, and their six month old daughter Sophia. Also a random fact... Mr. Taylor's art is also featured on his first boss's tombstone (what an honor, right!?).

MONIQUE QUINTANA is from Fresno, CA, and the author of Cenote City (Clash Books, 2019). Her work has appeared in various publications such as Pank, Wildness, Cheap Pop, Okay Donkey, and Luna Luna Magazine, where she is a contributing editor. Her writing has also been supported by Yaddo, The Mineral School, the Sundress Academy of the Arts, the Community of Writers, and the Open Mouth Poetry Retreat. You can find her @quintanagothic and moniquequintana.com.

PALACES is Editor-in-Chief of Wrongdoing Magazine, Staff Contributor at The Aurora Journal, Hecate Magazine, and The Jupiter Review, and Editor elsewhere. She has a BAH from Queen's University, and she's placed work in Eclectica Magazine, Maudlin House, Witch Craft Magazine, and many others. Find her at pascapotvin.com or @pascapotvin on Twitter.

TAHLIA MCKINNON is a wild writer, myth-maker and the founding editor-in-chief of Hecate Magazine. Her creative work has/will be placed in The Daily Drunk Mag, Wrongdoing Magazine, Radical Arts Review and others. Tahlia's prose often centres on haunted love, exultant spirituality and her experiences as a trauma survivor. Find her online @tahliamckinnon or via tahliamariamckinnon.co.uk

SHAWN S. WHITE (he/him) is a writer, actor, and director, as well as co-founder of Queer Colors Theater, a theater company that specializes in queer stories. If not typing or performing, Shawn spends a significant amount of time with his cat, Skitty, re-watching The Sopranos, and playing video games. Twitter: Shawn_W_ (https://twitter.com/Shawn_W_)

TIM GAYDOS is a horror junkie who likes to spoil his cat with things she does not appreciate. His previous work has appeared on the comedy site Robot Butt and in the horror anthology After the Kool-Aid is Gone. You can disagree with him on Twitter @timthinksthings

LOUISE MATHER is a poet from Northern England. You can find her on Twitter @lm2020uk and her work is published or forthcoming in magazines such as Fly on the Wall Press, Streetcake Magazine, The Cabinet of Heed, Versification, Crow & Cross Keys, Dust Poetry Magazine and Lanke Review. She writes about ancestry, rituals, endometriosis, fatigue and mental health, and is editor of the cat-themed anthology Feline Utopia.

SAMANTHA FAIN is an MFA candidate at Bowling Green State University. Her first chapbook, “Coughing Up Planets,” debuted with Vegetarian Alcoholic Press this March, and her microchap “sad horse music” debuts with The Daily Drunk this May. Her work has appeared in The Indianapolis Review, SWWIM, 8 Poems, and others. She tweets at @smnthfn.

NICKS WALKER is a queer trans Scottish kelpie, currently land-locked by a charming fox somewhere on the Southern English coast. His allies include yellow, and his enemies include the sun. You can find his objects in The Bear Creek Gazette, Sludgelit, The Speculative Book 2021, The Daily Drunk Mag and elsewhere. He has four rats and autism and tweets @nickserobus.

JOSH SIPPPIE is the Director of Publishing Guidance at Gotham Writers and an Associate Editor of Uncharted Mag. His writing can be found at McSweeney’s Internet Tendency, Hobart, Brevity, Sledgehammer Lit, Wretched Creations, Not Deer, and more. When not writing, he can be found wondering why he isn't writing. More at joshsippie.com or Twitter @sippenator101.

JAMESON HAMPTON is an adventurer from Buffalo, NY who wishes they were immortal so they'd have time to visit every coffee shop in the world. Find them online at jameybash.com or on twitter @jameybash.

About The Editor

KRISTIN GARTH is a Pushcart, Rhysling nominated sonneteer and a Best of the Net 2020 finalist. Her sonnets have stalked journals like Glass, Yes, Five:2:One, Luna Luna and more. She is the author of 20 books of poetry including Candy Cigarette Womanchild Noir (Hedgehog Poetry Press), Flutter Southern Gothic Fever Dream (TwistiT Press), and Girlarium (Fahmidan Journal). She is the founder of Pink Plastic House a tiny journal and co-founder of Performance Anxiety, an online poetry reading series. Follow her on Twitter: (@lolaandjolie) and her website kristingarth.com

